Forensic Psychology is the application of psychology to the criminal justice system. Forensic Psychology is used in various forms, such as in treating mentally ill offenders, consulting with attorneys (e.g., on picking a jury), analysing a criminal's mind and intent, and practicing within the civil arena.

The committee on Ethical Guidelines for Forensic Psychologists (1991) defined forensic psychology as a field that covers “all forms of professional conduct when acting, with definable fore-knowledge, as a psychological expert on explicitly psychological issues in direct assistance to the courts, parties to legal proceedings, correctional and forensic mental health facilities, and administrative, judicial and legislative agencies acting in a judicial capacity.” Forensic Psychology is a unique field and the only field in Forensic Sciences that deals with live human beings or the individuals who are directly in conflict with law.
